Pedro de Arbués, canonized as San Pedro de Arbués by Pope Pius the Ninth in 1867, was born at Epila in Aragón about 1441. After having received a religious education and after having held a canonship in the Metropolitan Church of San Salvador at Zaragoza, he was appointed Inquisitor in Aragón by the first Spanish Inquisitor-General, Tomás de Torquemada. Aragón, always jealous of her rights, as the Fueros bore witness for centuries, did not welcome the establishment of a Holy Office within her borders. Certain influential and wealthy Jews and conversos, supported by persons in authority and with money collected for the purpose, persuaded Juan Sperandeu, a tanner, a Frenchman Vidal Durango or Duranzo his servant, a man named Mateo Ram with his follower

Tristán, and a certain Juan de Abadía to cause "to disappear from the world" the much-hated Inquisitor. One night in September while Arbués was attending matins in La Seo, kneeling in his vestments at a column near the altar, two men, Abadía and Durango approached him. "Strike him, traitor, that's he," said Abadía in a low voice. Durango struck with his sword, piercing the throat of the Inquisitor who was then stabbed repeatedly by Sperandeu. Arbués was carried to his home where he died from his wounds. Retribution soon overtook the conspirators. Those accused of the murder, Sperandeu, Ram, and Durango were drawn, quartered, and finally burned. Tristán escaped and Abadía killed himself by suffocation.
